Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The Windy Run School stands in an isolated vale on a half-acre parcel surrounded by an open meadow in the sparsely populated hill country of southeastern Braxton County, West Virginia. The tiny white-painted frame structure, the only remaining one-room schoolhouse in the county, stands out in its rustic setting of summer green and winter gray.

Otter District's Windy Run School is a very well-preserved example of the now-rare 19th-century rural frame schoolhouse. Built in 1889, the spare and functional qualities of its simple design have invested the edifice with longevity because, unlike many larger and more ornate wooden buildings of the period, deterioration of intricate and vulnerable sawn and turned parts was not a factor in the history of the building's maintenance. The schoolhouse is, nevertheless, a substantial example of period carpentry. The twenty-four-foot wide by twenty-eight-foot deep rectangle features generous side walls of 3-bays each and ample fenestration; three broad windows are double hung and contain 6x6 lights per sash. Mouldings, window and door casing, corner boards, and frieze boards are all plain, but well appointed finish items.

Five-inch wide weatherboard siding and standing seam metal roofing lend durability to the Windy Run School. The transom-lighted front door is sheltered beneath a single-bay gabled porch. A commodious single room is finished much as it was when the last classes were held there in 1963. A blackboard, window-blinds, occasional framed pictures, and tables and chairs remain in the building. Heating was provided by a stove centered in the room and attached to a small central chimney. A frame, gable-roofed privy stands 150 feet to the rear of the schoolhouse on the edge of the meadow.

The Windy Run School, presently owned by the Braxton County Board of Education, is vacant. It is the focal point of an annual homecoming of former students who journey to the site each summer to renew old acquaintances. The homecoming group undertakes, with cooperation of the county school board, necessary repairs and maintenance. Dr. Hoy E. Eakle, a leading citizen of the county, has played an important role in this endeavor. Dr. Eakle taught school at Windy Run School in the years 1934-35.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

Built in 1889, the Windy Run School of Otter District, Braxton County, West Virginia, is significant as the only surviving one-room schoolhouse in the county, and as a very well preserved example of 19th-century rural frame vernacular architecture in central West Virginia. The tiny edifice is also important because it remains the focal point of an annual homecoming of former students, many of whom have achieved prominence in professional and public service career fields throughout the United States.

The legendary "ole one-room schoolhouse", often portrayed in literature and popular art, remains a significant and beloved part of the success story of America's public education history. The primary education received by thousands of citizens in these facilities provided a sound footing for those who continued their training in advanced institutions, and gave the many who remained in the rural areas - often engaged in agricultural pursuits - sound, life-long training in rudimentary but necessary educational skills. Jesse Stuart, the noted writer on rural Americana themes, has often alluded to the importance of the rural, primary educational system.

The school at Windy Run was built in 1889 by Jacob Huffman, a local builder, according to the history of the school district and recorded by one Frank Skidmore, in a letter to the Braxton Board of Education, dated March 7, 1936. Speaking "with pardonable pride", Skidmore notes the "advancement made by the pupils" as evidenced by the skills of an early teacher who "without high school or normal training, twenty two pupils of the school and 10 pupils of near here who finished their primary education and qualified for teachers, many of them making first grade certificates, and many of them entered medical colleges, law schools, business colleges, passed their examinations, graduated and went to work in their chosen professions and have filled, and are now filling, positions of honor and trust."

The frame schoolhouse at Windy Run is the best preserved of the small number of such structures known in central West Virginia. It retains a great deal of its historical integrity, including plumb walls, a fine standing seam metal roof, and good carpentry details such as corner boards, frieze boards, and other elements simply but well fashioned.

Within such a humble but essential public facility were many to be furnished, in the words of Mr. Skidmore, with the "primary qualifications for doctors, nurses, lawyers, business men and women, officers and ministers and last but not least the community farmers who are good citizens and kind and obliging neighbors, so we have provided everything necessary for the physical and spiritual needs from the cradle to the grave."
